CONFLICT COACHING: A POWERFUL ADR TOOL

ROBIN N. AMADEI, J.D.

Introduction

Conflict coaching is defined as a set of skills and strategies that helps people manage or productively resolve conflict. In this process the conflict coach works one-on-one with a coachee experiencing conflict with another person. In conflict coaching the coachee can talk about the conflict with a neutral third party (the conflict coach), consider options for managing the conflict and design an approach to discuss the conflict with the other person. Conflict coaching can be used as a stand-alone process or can be practiced with each of the parties in separate meetings during mediation.

Conflict coaching can be useful in a variety of circumstances, including conflicts in the workplace, divorce and post-decree situations, community disputes, family disagreements, and business conflicts. The conflict coach can serve as a confidential listener, help the coachee see the situation from all perspectives, support the coachee in considering options, and help the coachee come up with a plan of action to deal with the conflict. In conflict coaching the coachee, not the coach, is responsible for the outcome. The conflict coach uses process skills to help the coachee develop clarity about the situation, enabling the coachee to effectively and confidently make high-quality decisions to manage the conflict. Also, the conflict coach can help the coachee rehearse a conversation so that the coachee is prepared to more confidently enter into the conflict resolution discussion.

To demonstrate how conflict coaching might be implemented, let's examine the following workplace dispute: Bill and Jane are in the same department and often need to work on projects jointly. For the last couple of months their working relationship has been fraught with conflict. Their supervisor, Charlie, told both of them that they need to work their differences out because the conflict was impacting the entire work team. Charlie told them that if they needed help resolving the conflict, they should consult with HR, as he had heard that HR has conflict coaching and mediation resources. For several weeks, however, neither Jane nor Bill took any initiative in resolving the conflict. The conflict, meanwhile, continued to simmer and worsened

BOULDER COUNTY LEGAL SERVICES HAD A GREAT YEAR BY JOEL HAYES, JR.

2010 was a very good year at Boulder County Legal Services. We interviewed 886 potential clients and assisted 838. Of this total we referred 144 clients to pro bono attorneys. 34 clients were given contract attorneys. Our four in-house pro bono attorneys, Meg Quiat, Norton Steuben, Emma Pinter and Bruce Wiener, represented 83 clients. I represented 75 client, and advised 251 others. 232 family law cases were referred to our pro se Clinic. 41 clients were referred to reduced fee bankruptcy attorneys. Nine clients were referred for representation by other CLS offices. The remaining 48 clients were rejected, primarily for being over income or resources.

The total intakes and clients served from the last five years appear below:

2006 Total intake 568; served 545
 2007 Total intake 678; served 657
 2008 Total intake 718; served 686

over time. The other day Bill reached a frustration threshold and decided to visit with Lisa, an HR generalist in the organization, who had received conflict coaching training. Bill agreed to engage in conflict coaching with Lisa serving as coach. These are the steps that took place over a period of two conflict coaching sessions of 11/2 hours each.

Step 1: Build Rapport

Lisa and Bill engaged in a bit of small talk, exchanged background information and captured a sense of one another's communication style. Lisa noted that Bill was fairly concise and perhaps needed to be drawn out through powerful questions. Lisa acknowledged Bill for asking her to help him proactively work through conflicts with Jane.

Step 2: Overview of Coaching Process

Lisa described her role as conflict coach and asked Bill about his expectations for her role to make sure that these expectations were aligned. She described the steps of the coaching model and the types of questions she might ask Bill at each stage. Lisa suggested that coaching would be effective if Bill enters it with an open mind, a willingness to look at the issue from all perspectives, focus, and an orientation to meet both his and Jane's needs. Also, Lisa reviewed confidentiality parameters, reminded Bill that he can discontinue coaching at any time, and discussed logistics. She then obtained Bill's commitment to enter the coaching process.

Step 3: identify Client's Goals

Lisa asked Bill to state his goals for conflict coaching generally and his goals for this particular meeting. Bill stated that his general goal was to improve his working relationship with Jane. His specific goals for this coaching meeting included talking through the situation with Lisa and looking at process options that would meet his general goal. Lisa reminded Bill that he could change his goal or add additional goals at any time.

Step 4: Client's Sharing of Perspectives

In this stage of the process, Bill was invited to share his perspective on the incident or incidents that led to the existing conflict. At times Bill reflected some emotional intensity and Lisa acknowledged his feelings. Lisa asked Bill about his needs going forward. After asking Bill to describe the situation from his perspective, Lisa asked Bill to explore Jane's perspective. She asked Bill to articulate what Jane's feelings might be and postulate on Jane's needs going forward. As Lisa asked powerful questions to help Bill deeply consider Jane's perspective, there was a perceptible shift in Bill's orientation. For the first time Bill realized that there could be a different perspective. This was extremely enlightening to him and laid the foundation for productive conflict resolution.

Step 5: Explore and Test Options

After fully examining perspectives, Bill was ready to explore and test options. Options that Bill considered included taking Jane to lunch to try to talk through the conflict, meeting in a business setting, having someone mediate a discussion and sending Jane an e-mail. Lisa asked Bill to consider criteria to evaluate the options. His criteria included:

simplicity, comfort, minimize chances of rejection, and enable a personal connection. Using these criteria as a backdrop, Lisa asked Bill to evaluate the pros and cons of each option. After doing so, Bill felt that meeting with Jane in a business setting was the best option.

Interim Step: Define Next Steps (for next coaching session)

Since Lisa and Bill were at the end of the 11/2 hour time period allocated for this conflict coaching session, Lisa asked Bill to reflect on any insights that he gleaned from the discussion thus far. She suggested that he write these insights down so that he would not forget them.

Then Lisa assigned some homework to prepare for the next meeting. She asked Bill to make a list of the specific things that he would want to say to Jane in their discussion. Lisa indicated that Bill would have the chance to discuss his ideas with Lisa at the next coaching meeting and practice the conversation. Bill and Lisa scheduled the next meeting and Bill went back to his office.

Step 5: Explore and Test Options, Continued

Two days later Lisa welcomed Bill back to coaching. She checked in with him to see if there were any new insights or new developments or if anything had shifted in Bill's thinking. Bill was satisfied that things were still on the track established at the last meeting. Bill had done a lot of thinking about what he wanted to say to Jane and how he wanted to say it. He reviewed his plan with Lisa who proposed that Bill practice his conversation, with Lisa role playing as Jane. Lisa asked

'I AM CONSUMED WITH APATHY'

By RICH IRVIN

That is the observation by Doctor Velie (Walter Brennan) in "Bad Day at Black Rock." He plays the resident undertaker and town doctor of Black Rock, a small mineral town in Nevada at the end of a road to nowhere. Spencer Tracy plays John McCready, a retired Army major at the end of World War II, who gets off the train in Black Rock. He is searching for a Japanese farmer named Komoko, whose son saved Spencer Tracy's life in Italy and was later killed in action. John McCready is delivering the son's medals to his father. He immediately runs into a wall of silence that envelopes the town. According to the town's residents, Komoko has disappeared, his farm having burned down right after Pearl Harbor.

When McCready visits the small farm at Adobe Flats he realizes that Komoko was murdered because he was Japanese and that the town is covering it up. The gist of the movie is that John McCready solves the murder and awakens the conscience of the residence. It also contains one of the best fight scenes in movie history (McCready only has one arm.)

I picked the movie "Bad Day at Black Rock" as part of my series on Ralph Carr. Although there are no lawyers or courtroom scenes, the film does illustrate the intense hostility toward the Japanese-Americans post-Pearl Harbor. It also makes Ralph Carr's expression of tolerance and his advocacy of the rights for the Japanese to be treated as citizens and not as the enemy. He stood against the tide of the public opinion.

But Carr was a lone voice in the wilderness. No less than the governor of California, Earl Warren, soon to be protector of civil rights in the Supreme Court, argued for the detention of all citizens of Japanese descent because it was impossible "to distinguish between dangerous and loyal Japs." General DeWitt, head of the Western Defense Command, argued, "The fact that nothing (acts of sabotage) has happened so far, makes it more ominous." The entire House and Senate delegation from the western states sent a letter to President Roosevelt arguing "That no citizen...may cloak his disloyalty or subversive activity under the mantle of citizenship alone...". The governor of Wyoming called for just hanging all the Japanese from a tree if found in Wyoming.

Ralph Carr stood up to this tidal wave of animosity, hate and fear that caused citizens of Japanese descent to be treated as disloyal solely because of their nationality. As he explained to the state, "There are

Bill how she should play the role and invited Bill to recalibrate at any time during the practice conversation. Bill gave Lisa permission to interrupt to provide feedback on how his message was delivered and, if applicable, to suggest that he consider a different approach.

Bill and Lisa then went into the role play. Bill conveyed his perspective, carefully framing his message and monitoring his tone of voice and body language. Lisa made every effort to play the role of Jane accurately. At logical juncture points, Lisa stopped the role play for discussion and feedback. She asked Bill how the conversation felt to him so far and gave him feedback on how some of his statements landed on her. She then gave Bill an opportunity to replay some statements to increase the likelihood that Jane would respond positively. Lisa asked Bill what roadblocks could arise in the discussion and how he might handle them. The role playing lasted approximately 45 minutes. By the end Bill felt confident about having a conversation with Jane.

Step 6: Define Next Steps

After the role play was completed, Bill reaffirmed that he would like to proceed with the conversation with Jane. Lisa invited Bill to map out an action plan. Guided by Lisa's questions, Bill specified logistics and timing for initiating a conversation with Jane. He agreed to send Jane an e-mail when he returned to his office that day asking her to meet with him to discuss their communication and working relationship. Assuming Jane agreed, he would schedule the conference room on the first floor for their discussion. If Jane did not agree to meet, Bill would visit with Lisa again to determine possible next steps to manage that setback. Lisa asked Bill to send her an e-mail or visit with her in person after his discussion with Jane to let her know how things went. Bill agreed. Lisa reiterated her availability to support Bill in working to resolve the conflict. Bill left, empowered to go forward with his plan.

Conclusion

As illustrated above, conflict coaching can be a powerful tool to help manage conflict. The conflict coach helps the coachee think through multiple aspects of a conflict and consider options to improve the situation. The conflict coach serves an important role by asking questions, providing feedback, offering insights and especially active listening. Conflict coaching can be useful at any stage of a conflict, both formally and informally, and should be considered when there is an ongoing working relationship or need to communicate.

IT'S ABOUT THE VOLUNTEERS!

Of course we could not have done this without the support of our volunteers and the Boulder legal community. Our talented team of retired professionals worked tirelessly to interview potential clients in our office, senior centers and safe houses in Boulder and Longmont as well as clients' homes, nursing homes and hospitals. Our pro bono attorneys did yeoman's work representing many clients so well. The Pro Se Clinic volunteers met with record numbers of clients without flinching. Even with all the great volunteers, we always have a great need for lawyers to assist with family law cases. Erika Martinez, our Pro Bono Coordinator, and Marcy Eskanos, our secretary, join me in thanking you all for making 2010 a productive and enjoyable year and for proving what a volunteer-based effort can achieve.

thousands of men, women and children who by reason but blood only, are regarded by some people as unfriendly."

Carr welcomed the Japanese into Colorado at the internment camp at Granada, although he opposed the deportation order. He argued that they should be treated like citizens not enemies. He employed a young woman from the internment camp as his governess. He personally picked her up from the train station to welcome her and lessen her anxiety. Patriotism was the core of his reason standing up for the civil rights of the Japanese. The Japanese were Americans "who should be not be imprisoned without proof. What is more important that the Constitutional rights afforded to the citizens?" In the end he was proven right.

His stand for the rights of the Japanese-Americans was only one of the many times Carr stood up for the rights of the unpopular. After he was elected governor in 1938, he hired George Robinson, a black man, to be at the welcome desk in the Governor's front office, the first face a visitor saw. This was in a state where the Ku Klux Klan had supported a previous governor, Clarence Morley. He also refused to approve the construction of Camp Hale unless the construction was open to all companies regardless of their ethnic ownership (read Hispanic). The response changed the bidding process, opening it to all.

Ralph Carr was born in 1887 and grew up in Cripple Creek, Colorado. He graduated from the University of Colorado Law School and opened a law practice in Antonito, Colorado. He became one of the foremost water lawyers in the state and became an assistant attorney general in 1927. He was appointed US Attorney for Colorado by Herbert Hoover. He rose rapidly through the state Republican Party and was elected governor in 1938. He served from 1939-1943. He stood for fiscal responsibility and ethics, and was a vehement opponent of the New Deal. But he also stood for constitutional rights for all. "If you harm them, you must harm me. I was brought up in a small town where I knew the shame and dishonor of race hatred. I grew to despise it because it threatened the happiness of you and you and you."

There were three US Supreme Court decisions that upheld the right of the government to detain people of Japanese ancestry solely on racial heritage. Fred Korematsu, Gordon Hirabayashi and Minoru Yasui all had their convictions upheld. The justices were clearly uncomfortable with their decisions. Justice Black, writing for the majority in the Korematsu case, conceded that detention based on race was "odious to a free people" but that under the wartime emergency there was a rational basis. Justice Robert Jackson in his dissenting opinion pointed out that the Courts decision would become a "loaded weapon" against racial or ethnic minorities during wartime.

Business owners & management teams often find themselves in need of advice on running their businesses – whether it is legal guidance on structuring a small business or strategic corporate counseling. Many spend countless hours determining the most appropriate legal path for their business model, and when selecting an attorney, mistakes may be costly. PRESIDENT'S PAGE (continued from page 8)

In the 1980's all three convictions were reversed due to governmental misconduct based on discovered documents from the National Archives. They showed that the government had withheld reports and evidence from the courts. This evidence withheld by the FBI and military intelligence would have shown that there was no military necessity for internment of Japanese-Americans as they posed no security risk. This was based on "willful historical inaccuracy and international falsehoods." The facts presented by Solicitor General Charley Fahy to the court during arguments to the Supreme Court in 1943 were patently false.

Ralph Carr returned to his law practice in Antonito after he was defeated in the 1942 Senate election by Senator Edwin Johnson. In 1950 he ran for governor but died during the campaign. Although he was reviled for his actions in 1941-42, the people of Colorado now understood that he had been right.

The new Colorado judicial complex is to be named after him.

Ralph Carr was not consumed with apathy like the people of Black Rock. He was its antithesis. He spoke out at great personal and political risk. He did it because it was the right thing to do. May we all be so blessed.
